Building your own Home or Home Improvement ... common sense or a missed opportunity!

The prospect of a perfect home may seem a distant dream to the vast majority of us, in fact the prospect of having a home at all, may seem a bit of a distant dream. But there is a way.

More than 20,000 people nationwide choose to build their own homes each year. Why? The average self builder can save on average 30% on the cost of an equivalent home bought from a developer. For those of you who wish to stay in the area where you currently live, renovating and extending your home still offers a more cost effective means of attaining the additional space that your growing family needs. More and more homeowners are beginning to wake up to the possibility that they can save significant sums of money by improving their existing homes rather than selling and buying property through Estate Agents. So how much money could you save yourself by improving your existing home? Survey costs, stamp duty, Estate Agent fees and Removals costs alone could pay for an extension on your existing property. That's before you look at Mortgage repayment interest, the cost to store your furniture, the cost to redecorate your new home, increased Council tax etc.

Exploring the potential of your existing home may prove to be the best financial decision you have made in a long time. As I said before, is it common sense or a missed opportunity?
